

JENNIFER DAVIS LOOKED TO BE THE PICTURE OF HEALTH. BUT SOMETHING WAS TERRIBLY WRONG WITH THE PICTURE.

An avid runner and the mother of two girls, 40 year old Jennifer Davis was in terrific physical shape. One night, Jennifer felt a tightness in her chest. Thinking it would go away, she went to lie down. But it was wishful thinking—she felt a wave of nausea and pain started radiating up to her jaw. Finally she went to BayCare's St. Anthony's Hospital. The medical team found she was having an extremely rare type of heart attack: spontaneous coronary artery dissection of the left anterior descending artery. Jennifer was rushed to the cath lab, where doctors inserted two stents, which opened her artery. And she can thank heaven that this extremely rare heart attack was treated at an extremely rare hospital.

BayCare hospitals treat more adult acute heart attack patients than any other health system in the greater Tampa Bay area.*
