

The first goal was to save her life. The second was to try to save her arm and leg. The dog attack had been shocking and severe. One minute Ramona had been playing tug of war in her yard on the Cape, then a few hours later there were two teams of Rhode Island Hospital trauma surgeons working on her. The journey she has been on has been long—punctuated by heart-breaking setbacks and remarkable progress. But as she and her husband enjoy their evening back in that yard—no matter how bad the weather—it feels like it's a beautiful day.
